Student Life · Sex Issue 2016

Student Love

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2016 · PHOTO BY MADELEINE UNDERWOOD

nude news

ON THE COVER

Gemma and Emma, both sophomores, have been friends since they were five years old. Their winning cover idea theme was "Banned Books"—they are pro-literature and anti-censorship.

MADELEINE UNDERWOOD | STUDENT LIFE

Results of survey reveal sexual habits of WU undergraduate student body

For another look at the statistics, see feature on pages 4-5

ELLA CHOCHREK
STAFF REPORTER

The results for Student Life's 2016 Sex Survey revealed that while over 30 percent of Washington University students are virgins, 9 percent would have sex with presidential candidate Marco Rubio.

The survey, which collected responses from over 1,400 students, focused on topics such as relationships, sexual history, sexual behaviors and sexual assault.

Of all respondents, 43.4 percent of students reported that they are currently in a relationship. Of that cohort, around 8 percent defined that as consistently hooking up with the same person.

Freshman Allison Camm said she was surprised by how high the percentage of students who were in relationships was.

The majority (52 percent) of respondents who have had sex reported that they lost their virginity while 17 or 18 years old. Forty-five percent of students who have had sex lost their virginity in college, and 64 percent lost their virginity to someone they were in a relationship with.

Nearly a third of students—32.3 percent—surveyed have never had sex: a figure that remained about constant from the 2015 survey.

When asked "What do you consider sex?" over 99 percent of students agreed that vaginal penetration counted. Around three-fourths of participants noted that anal penetration was sex, and 36.2 percent of participants said that oral sex counted as sex.

Thirty percent of respondents had only had one sexual partner, and around 30 percent of students reported having 2-3 sexual partners. Less than 10 percent of survey participants report having had more than 10 sexual partners.

Of the 1,285 students who answered questions regarding sexual assault, approximately 7 percent of students reported that they had been sexually assaulted by a student at the University and another 9.1 percent responded that they had been sexually assaulted by someone who is not a student at Washington University.

Freshman Juliana Berlin feels that the number of students who have been sexually assaulted at the University is unacceptable.

"I think that number [of students who have been sexually assaulted by other students] is too high, and as a student body we should do something to lower than number because no sexual assault is ever warranted," Berlin said.

In response to the question "Have you ever been pressured to engage in sexual acts you weren't comfortable engaging in?", 36 percent of those who answered questions regarding sexual assault said that they had, and 20 percent reported that one or more party was intoxicated. Sixteen percent reported that neither party was intoxicated.

Vagina Monologues refocuses on transgender inclusivity through beneficiary choice

ALEX SIEGMAN
NEWS EDITOR

The Vagina Monologues will feature an increased focus on trans-inclusivity thanks to the St. Louis Metro Trans Umbrella Group (MTUG), the beneficiary of this year's production.

V-Day Wash U, a chapter of the national organization V-Day, puts on the performance and aims to end violence against women by fundraising for groups such as MTUG. The show itself aims to engage topics involving sex, gender, sexuality, sexual violence, oppression, sexism, feminism, self-love and LGBT issues.

The effort to increase the representation of trans experiences within the show is, according to producer and senior Shana Zucker, necessary to propagate the voices and stories of those with different experiences.

"Having transwomen represented in The Vagina Monologues is important because it means that an important and often marginalized narrative is being heard," Zucker said.

Junior Emma Laursen appreciates the significance of trans-inclusivity in the show.

"I think it's fantastic and absolutely necessary to include trans people in the show. Vagina Monologues draws in a lot of people who might not otherwise participate in this kind of dialogue, and trans issues should absolutely be a part of that," Laursen said.

Despite taking steps to progress alongside the expanding landscape of sexual identity, it is difficult to reach every member of an audience, Zucker explained.

"I will be the first to admit that this show is not perfect," Zucker said. "The conflation of sex and gender in this piece is problematic. This piece will resonate with some transwomen, but not all. But what is important is that we are hoping to start a dialogue. That is what is significant about this show. The Vagina Monologues starts conversations."

The Vagina Monologues, among other topics, seeks to expand the conversation regarding sexual assault, which, as revealed by the Student Life Sex Survey, is all too relevant at Washington University.

"Sexual assault is an epidemic that is on this campus," Zucker said. "Working to eliminate the 'taboo' of talking about vaginas is an important first step towards addressing this epidemic. The issues that the show addresses are not just women's issues; they are everyone's issues."

Former cast member and 2015 graduate Caroline Leffert reflected upon the ways in which The Vagina Monologues affected her.

"I saw it first as a freshman and was shocked to learn that other people felt the same way about their bodies as I did: insecurity, occasionally joy, sometimes disgust," Leffert said.

Zucker expanded upon Leffert's comment, stating that she hopes all audience members take away a powerful and personal message.

"I hope that when viewers walk out of the show, that they have considered a new perspective, and that they feel the confidence to start discussing these issues with their peers. 'Vagina' is a word to be celebrated," Zucker said.

Survey shows sexual health appointments not a top priority

EMILY SCHIENVAR
SENIOR NEWS EDITOR

Only 38 percent of the 1,426 undergraduates who took the Student Life Sex Survey have ever visited a medical professional for sexual health reasons.

Of the 62 percent of undergraduates who have not visited a medical professional for sexual health reasons, reasons were varied and often overlapped: 9 percent aren't sure where to go, 11 percent think their parents wouldn't approve, 8 percent think insurance is an issue, and 88 percent don't think they need to.

Fifty percent of those who have had a sexual health medical visit make appointments annually, while 45 percent visit on a more irregular schedule. Gynecologists were the most popular source, with 55 percent of students making appointments with them, while 49 percent of respondents made appointments with Student Health Services, 27 percent with a general practitioner, and 9 percent with Planned Parenthood.

Of the 460 virgins who completed the survey, only 13 percent have made a sexual health appointment, and 91 percent of those who haven't think they don't need to go. To those students, Cheri LeBlanc, director for student health and wellness for SHS, says that it is still important for non-sexually active students to check in, especially women over the age of 21, who should have a pap smear to test for cervical cancer every 3 years.

"For students who are not sexually active, seeing a provider is also important to review immunizations that can prevent STI's like Human Papilloma Virus (HPV) and Hepatitis B, or to discuss issues or questions students may have around sexual health, contraception, what's normal, what's not, etc." LeBlanc said.

Ninety-six percent of those who have visited a medical professional for sexual health reasons have not had a sexually transmitted infection, but LeBlanc noted that not all STI's have visible symptoms.

"It is important to have regular sexual health check-ups to screen for Sexually Transmitted Infections (STI's), as many STI's do not cause symptoms. The frequency of the visits depends on how often students encounter new partners. Some students schedule an appointment every three months for routine screening, others less often. If you are practicing safer sex, you are protecting yourself from many STI's and may need less frequent testing," LeBlanc said.

For those who are concerned about parents finding out or about insurance, LeBlanc did note that insurance bills do tend to cause some strife, as not all companies cover STI testing (though the SHS insurance does), and, if they do, bills are delivered to whoever pays them.

"We let our patients know that their parents may get a notice from their insurance provider indicating that testing was done, which may, in turn, set up an awkward conversation for our patient," LeBlanc said.

Women tend to be better about making sexual health appointments—about 51 percent did—while only about 17 percent of men have visited a medical professional for their sexual health. Of the 965 students who have had sex who filled out the survey, 50% have and 50% have not had a sexual health visit. LeBlanc, however, noted the importance of visits for both genders.

"We offer to do a routine genital exam, looking for any sores, lumps or bumps on the genital area and to screen for testicular cancer since this is the age group where it occurs. We walk them through how to do a testicular exam and recommend doing this monthly at home," she said.

Sex Survey proves engineers get more than just jobs: Results of survey show high intra-major dating

AMELIA MA
CONTRIBUTING REPORTER

According to the results of this year's Student Life Sex Survey, most Washington University students tend to date someone within the same school or division of major.

The annual survey was conducted over the past two weeks, which introduced a question regarding the academic majors of partners in relationships.

Based on the 1,415 students who disclosed their major, business school students were the most likely to date within their discipline, with roughly a quarter of those in a relationship dating another business student. Meanwhile, engineering students led the pack in commitment, with nearly half currently dating someone.

The survey also revealed that students are likely to have partners with similar majors to their own; for example, engineering students dating natural science students.

There is no lack, however, of people dating someone with a completely different academic major. Those who date outside of their major often meet their partners via extracurricular activities, common non-academic interests and residential communities.

Junior Yaala Muller, studying the humanities in the College of Arts & Sciences, felt that dating outside of one's academic major was not a big deal for students in Arts & Sciences.

"People studying art and architecture might date mostly inside their school because they are having the same courses and seeing the same people everyday. But for students in Arts & Sciences, I believe there is more freedom, and the rule is not necessarily true," Muller said.

The survey also revealed patterns of cross-major dating. After other Olin Business School students, business students tend to date engineers, who in turn are equally split between business and social science students. Humanities students tend to have more business school partners. Sam Fox School students appear to be interested in business and natural science students, although only 76 Sam Fox students completed the survey.

While stereotypes might render the following statistic surprising, engineers date more than any other academic major. Forty-nine percent of engineering undergraduates are currently dating someone, compared to about 43 percent for undergraduates overall.

Upon hearing the results of the survey, freshman Giselle Fuselier took pride in the results that prove engineering students are not just as likely, but in fact more likely, to date than other majors.

"That is amazing. I thought engineering students were less likely to be in a relationship. Besides, they usually have so much work to do that they don't have time for dating," Fuselier said.

Junior engineering student Aaron Hall noted that his partner's major didn't make a major difference.

"My girlfriend is minoring in [computer science] but majors in finance. We met through a mutual friend. I don't think being in different schools makes it harder to meet new people or be in a relationship," Hall said.

sultry scene

USE WHAT MOTHER EARTH GAVE YOU

Ever feel like every weekend is the same old routine? Frat party, hook-up, repeat. If you're looking to shake things up in the bedroom, take note of these sex tips from the animal kingdom and get in touch with your wild side.

BY HANUSIA HIGGINS AND MAISIE HEINE | STAFF WRITERS

JEROEN KRANSEN | FLICKR CREATIVE COMMONS

BONOBOS

Evolutionarily speaking, bonobos are humans' closest living relatives on the phylogenetic tree. Sexually speaking, they are way more liberal than we will probably ever be. Some pearl-clutchers decry the oversexualization and moral decay of our society, calling phenomena like Miley Cyrus's 2013 twerk-fest "unnatural." But bonobos have been practicing free love since long before Cyrus, or the word "unnatural," ever existed. They use sex as a social exchange—an icebreaker, an apology, a fun activity with a friend; you name it—and they certainly aren't picky about who they're doing it with. So if you need a reason to loosen up your sexual standards, take some inspiration from the bonobos and don't let social constructs get in your way. For bonobos, the social construct is to have as many sexual encounters as you like, with whomever you like—as long as they're fully consenting, of course.

SQUIRRELS

Ever notice how the squirrels around Washington University tend to be a little wilier than the average? As it turns out, according to a recent study, it may have something to do with being around all of us hormonal students, since the promiscuity of female squirrels depends on their environment. Of course, "the environment" in that study was probably referring to the number of male squirrels around at a given time, but we'd still like to think that our two worlds can cross over. In any case, female squirrels, playful little creatures that they are, aren't too picky with their mates. They copulate with anywhere from one to 14 males in one day during their time of fertility. Although more partners means a greater risk for sexually transmitted diseases and increased vulnerability, those disadvantages don't seem to matter too much to female squirrels. All in all, ladies, don't aspire to be like the female squirrel.

ELEPHANTS

Ambiguous relationship statuses seem to be the curse of the modern-day hook-up culture, and people can get hurt. Guys, if you'd like to avoid the heartbreak of finding your object of affection with another, look to the elephant. Before he can even think about getting involved with a female, he has to face off with all the other competing males, who are all "in musk" (aka super horny). Once one male comes out on top, the female deems him worthy of an exclusive rendezvous. (Fun fact: male elephants are famous in the animal world for their giant, green erections.) Basically, you get all of the messy, confrontational stuff out of the way first and then have only long sunsets and lots of grass for the rest of your days.

BIRDS

You've heard about the birds and the bees, but how do they actually do the deed? (Not with each other, of course.) Birds' sex organs are distinct from mammals' in that both females and males have an opening called the cloaca which holds their reproductive cells. During mating time, a male and a female will rub their cloacas together to transfer sperm and inseminate the eggs. Now imagine (or don't—it's up to you) this happening with their tiny feet perched on a branch or on a telephone wire, and you may get an idea of the precarious balancing act that bird sex entails. It might take them a few tries to get the angles right, but, even in this difficult position, birds will eventually get the job done. How can you apply this knowledge to your own sex life? Try unconventional new sex positions! It might seem adventurous, but give it a shot—the payoff could be great. Don't get too crazy, though: contrary to popular belief, birds cannot have sex while airborne, and neither can you. Safety first.

BLACK WIDOW

Not looking for anything long-term? You may want to start emulating the black widow spider. Since the black widow will hit pretty much anything that breathes with highly poisonous venom, the male has to approach her carefully, doing a little dance on the web to gain her approval and good graces. The female is typically doing her thing, like using the hair on her legs to track movement on her web (yes, you can be empowered by your leg hair), when she lets the male spider approach and inject sperm inside her. Depending on her mood, she may let him go, but otherwise, he becomes a post-coital lunch. The moral of the story? I'm not 100 percent sure, but I think we can all agree that the females of this species are a badass standard to aspire to.

A Wash. U. student's guide to pick-up lines for every situation

SAM SEEKINGS
CONTRIBUTING WRITER

Congratulations, you've made it to college! By now, you've probably immersed yourself in academics, extracurricular activities, friends, and, of course, romantic interests. Many undergraduates, however, find themselves frustratingly incapable of succeeding in the latter of these pursuits. How can I possibly attract the attention of the gorgeous girl in the third row of my General Chemistry lecture? How do I get the rather muscular man sprawled out in the Danforth University Center Fun Room to notice me?

Well, dear reader, the solution is a simple one, tried and tested by generations of hormonally driven 18-22 year olds: use pickup lines! Here, courtesy of Student Life, is your definitive guide on how to deploy these handy little pieces of sexual innuendo with deadly efficiency, turning a romantic interest into a romantic partner at will.

How can I get the cute girl in my chemistry lecture to go on a date with me?

As fascinating as (insert chemistry professor's name here)'s lectures are, they are no match for teenage libido. Although enthralled by the details of chemical compounds, almost any undergraduate will eventually allow their eyes to wander, and their eyes will eventually come to rest on one of their peers. So, how to approach this? The key is to not seem to overeager. One must master the art of slowly putting one's things away, meanwhile inauspiciously checking to see if the object of desire is close to leaving the classroom. When she does, you must exit at the same time, sweep up beside her, and confidently demonstrate why you are boyfriend material. The first rule of pickup lines is that they have to be good.

Don't go there: "I think we really have a lot of chemistry together."

In order to woo the women of Washington University, nuance is required; something that says "I know you're an intelligent woman who comprehends the majority of concepts covered in this class, and I find that downright sexy." Periodic table puns are golden classics.

"Are you made of copper, because I Cu in a relationship with me."

"Girl you must be made of Florine, Iodine, and Neon, because you are FINe."

However, this is a top-15 university, and many refined women here may be unimpressed. They demand more. The sure-fire winner is something sophisticated and just dirty enough to let her know you mean business, with a little more pizzazz.

"You must be auxin, because you're causing me to have rapid stem elongation."

Employ this doozy and watch the women swoon before you.

How can I get the guy down the hall in my dorm to take an interest in me as more than a friend?

The key to any effective pickup line is its personal touch. You need to appeal more directly to his interests and specific desires. Could you give me some more information about him?

Well, he really likes Pokemon… Does that help?

Does that help? Evidently, I'm going to have to slow this down for you. That makes the entire process so simple. The wealth of Pokemon pickup lines is almost embarrassing—but also quite poetic.

"Roses are red, violets are blue, if you were a Pokemon, I'd choose you."

"I think I need a Paralyz Heal, because you're completely stunning."

But sometimes a more direct approach is the way to go.

"I want to ride you like a Horsea."

This is not to mention the vast wealth of Beedrill, Pikachu, and Jigglypuff lines which are also readily available. You couldn't have gotten a better opportunity if you tried.

Great! He also really likes Adam Sandler movies. Any advice there?

Yeah! Walk right up to him, lean in closely and whisper in his ear, "You have horrible taste in movies." Then turn back around and walk away. Absolutely no sexual encounter is worth more than an hour and a half spent watching "Grown Ups 2."

OK…that was kind of rude, but what if I know absolutely nothing about the person?

Well, if anything, you know that the apple of your eye attends Wash. U., so use that to your advantage. Think of the different buildings on campus. For example, Bear's Den provides a plethora of possibilities, as do Park House and the two Cupples.

"Did you lose part of you half and half? Because I think I'm it."

"You don't live in Park? Good thing you can Park yourself in my life instead."

"Speaking of Cupples, we'd be a great one."

A word of warning, however: don't use Busch. Just don't do it.

Understanding all of this, you are prepared to woo any classmate, floor-mate, or random attractive person on campus. So go forth, dear reader, and use this information well. May you find success in your endeavours.

Student Love
VOLUME 137, SPECIAL EDITION

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF Megan Magray
ASSOCIATE EDITOR Noah Jodice
MANAGING EDITORS Sarah Hands, Katharine Jaruzelski, Manvitha Marni, Maddie Wilson
SENIOR NEWS EDITOR Emily Schienvar
SENIOR FORUM EDITOR Wesley Jenkins
SENIOR SPORTS EDITOR Aaron Brezel
SENIOR SCENE EDITOR Lindsay Tracy
SENIOR CADENZA EDITOR Mark Matousek
SENIOR PHOTO EDITORS Stephen Huber, Skyler Kessler
LONGFORM EDITOR Zach Kram
CREATIVE DIRECTOR Becca Christman
COPY CHIEF Ella Chochrek
ART DIRECTOR Alex Berger
DESIGN EDITOR Noa Yadidi
GENERAL MANAGER Ray Bush
ADVERTISING MANAGER Claire Martin

Copyright © 2015 Washington University Student Media, Inc. (WUSMI). Student Life is a financially and editorially independent, student-run newspaper serving the Washington University community. Our newspaper is a publication of WUSMI and does not necessarily represent the views of the Washington University administration.

let's talk about sex, baby...

MASTER OF ONE

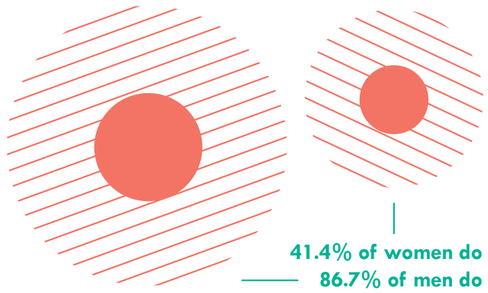

Do you masturbate?

YES

- TOTAL 80.4%
- MEN 96.4%
- WOMEN 70.5%

NO

- PREFER NOT TO 57.1%
- DON'T KNOW HOW 31.8%
- MORAL REASONS 10%
- RELIGIOUS REASONS 8%

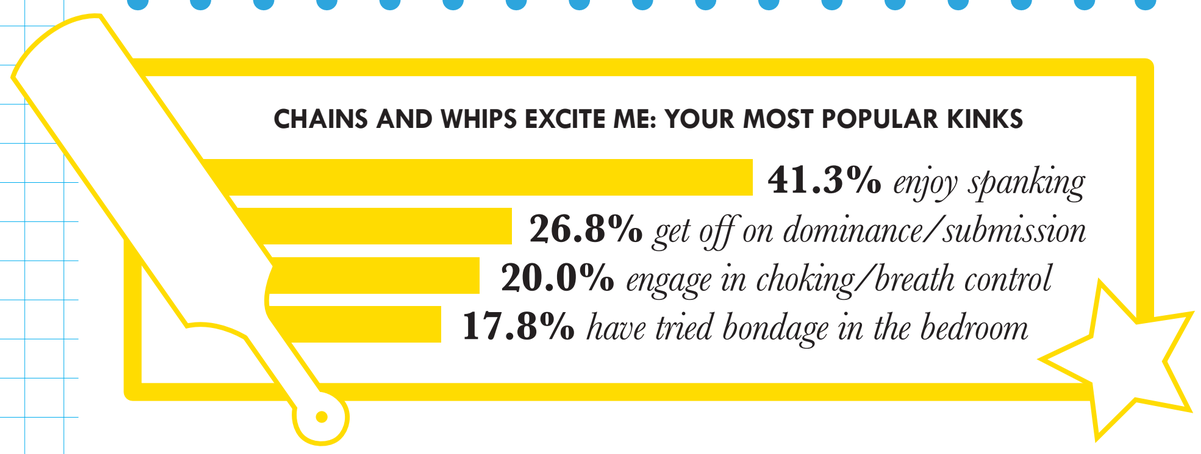

41.4% of women do
86.7% of men do

PORN HUB

Do you watch porn?

most popular sex toys: vibrator (18.2% own), handcuffs (9.5% own), dildo (6.4% own)

CHAINS AND WHIPS EXCITE ME: YOUR MOST POPULAR KINKS

I DID NOT HAVE SEXUAL RELATIONS WITH...

*Which presidential candidate would you have sex with?

MARCO RUBIO	38.9%
MARTIN O'MALLEY	31.1%
CARLY FIORINA	18.9%
HILLARY CLINTON	17.2%
BERNIE SANDERS	17.0%
DONALD TRUMP	10.7%
JEB BUSH	9.6%
TED CRUZ	7.7%
BEN CARSON	5.1%
JOHN KASICH	4.8%

*Among students who responded to question

42.2% have sent and recieved sexually explicit pictures.

55.8% have sexted.

59.6% of respondents use Tinder as a self-confidence boost.

67.7% of Wash. U. students have had sex.

55.2% of freshmen have had sex · 67.6% of sophomores · 75.1% of juniors · 79.8% of seniors

B-school students have the most sex.

respondents who have not had sex, by school:

33.7%	ArtSci
31.0%	Engineering
27.6%	Sam Fox
25.6%	Business

ZOINKS! YOUR WORST BOINKS

What is your most embarassing hookup story?

"[I] lost my virginity on a historical antique."

"When I was with a girl, things were getting going. Breathing heavy, scratching, and what not. Then, all of a sudden she whispered into my ear 'it's a leap year this year.'"

"[I had a] wet dream involving Rick Santorum. I should not have told my friends."

"My boyfriend was fingering me, and as he was doing so he whispered 'I'm a snail crawling up your vagina. You're a gross snailf—er.'"

SEXUAL ASSAULT

What do you consider sexual assault?

53.6% sex when there is a power imbalance

62.4% sex while at least one party is inebriated

Of those who reported being sexually assaulted, 14.6% did not report.

STAY HEALTHY, FAM

38.3% of respondents have visited a medical professional for sexual health reasons.

POLLED: 1,426 UNDERGRADS · MARGIN OF ERROR: 2% · PAGE DESIGN BY BECCA CHRISTMAN

f--k me forum

— Staff List —

How to best avoid a former flame (insert fire emoji here)

When we all toured Washington University however long ago, some apathetic tour guide explained how great it was that Wash. U. is a mid-sized university. How you will always see people you know around campus but can still meet new people regularly. What that poor, exhausted student failed to mention was the exaggerated Murphy's Law effect Wash. U. has for those people you've seen less than fully clothed. Wash. U. is the perfect size to run into your former flame be they hook-up, ex, or just a Saturday night DFMO ("dance floor make-out," for the uninitiated) on a much too consistent basis. To counteract the unnatural laws of nature, Forum Staff has put together their best suggestions for avoiding that one special someone.

Surround yourself constantly in a high school-esque "friend pack." Stay in the middle on your way to events at all times and ensure that you can go undetected as your group moves from location-to-location. Think of yourselves as the wolves from "Twilight," or if that concept creeps you out, perhaps model your team after the raunchier "Bad News Bears."

On the other hand, if you're like me and realize having a wolf-pack to guard you is a ridiculous concept given your lack of friends, your phone can hide your face really well. Just pretend to be texting someone or play a game of 2048 (that way, it looks like you're aggressively interested in the screen). You can avoid eye contact and prevent the oh-so-dreaded "hello" that can be unreasonably uncomfortable for all involved parties. —Peter Dissinger

Important question: do you like coffee? Yes? Well, actually, that doesn't matter. Does your ex like coffee? If you answered no, stop reading and get better taste in exes. Otherwise, avoiding your ex is actually quite simple. Text them and invite them to get coffee with you. Give them that whole "I'm-ready-to-be-friends-and-every-time-I-see-pictures-of-you-on-Facebook-with-other-people-I'm-SO-okay-with-it" spiel. Set up a time. A place. Now you're probably thinking: "But Noa, this makes no sense—it sounds like you're making me do the exact opposite of what you're supposed to be helping me with." Ah, but I'm not finished. Now that you know exactly where your ex will be and when—just don't show up. See? Ex perfectly avoided. —Noa Yadidi

The question is not how to avoid a former flame, but how to get him to avoid you. Answer: be weird. Like, really weird. Be the person he wishes he never dated. Listen to music without headphones in the library. Bring a very pungent chicken salad to class and eat it loudly. Play with the squirrels by pretending you are one. Sing while you walk (especially effective if you're not a good singer). Take a nap in the library and snore. Don't shower and brag about how long it's been since you showered. In no time, you're going to be seeing much less of him—because every time he sees you, he mysteriously disappears. Problem solved. However, you're now going to have to deal with your new reputation as "that weird girl." —Ariel Kravitz

Because we live in a terrifying world of too much technology, there's obviously an app for that. What better way to avoid that teaching assistant you got a little too personal with or the Harry's hookup (R.I.P.) who wouldn't leave fast enough in the morning than to stalk their every move with the help of your handy-dandy smartphone? The Split app uses the built-in location tracker on social media apps like Instagram and Twitter (that we've all accidentally allowed access to our whereabouts) to make sure that a given area is clear of anyone you want to avoid. Or, if creepiness isn't really your style, you could always just suck it up when you see them and give the awkward half-smile, head-nod that we all know and love. —Rachel Katzin

All you have to do is become the perfect, banal student. Go to class, eat lunch, go to class, study on the third floor of the Olin Library (in one of the little cubicles), eat dinner in your room by ordering it to-go, prepare for next day's classes, get ready for bed and then fall asleep by 9 p.m. The only flaw to this plan would be if you were naive and innocent enough to sign up for the same classes as your ex. If this is the case: I do not have any more advice for you on this matter. —Jeff Kang

The principle behind avoiding a former flame is a simple one: You must make sure your schedules never align. Since you and your former flame were once dating, it is probably the case that your schedules are naturally pretty similar. Given these assumptions, we can deduce that the solutions to this problem must involve schedule changing, and that, the more radical the schedule change, the greater the likelihood that you will never encounter your ex. So, clearly, the best way to avoid a former flame is to become nocturnal. If you and your ex both sleep eight hours a night, this plan is guaranteed to prevent you from encountering your ex at least 16 hours of every day. Sounds pretty effective to me. —Ethan Kerns

Did you ever want to be invisible? Now's your chance to hone your ninja skills. Duck into bushes whenever you see someone who sorta-kinda-maybe resembles your ex walking in the distance. If you're really obsessive about avoiding your former flame, keep your map open on the WUSTL app so you know which nearby buildings you can go into. Yes, this will take a lot of time out of your schedule, and yes, a few heads might turn when you disappear behind a tree on your way to class. But don't worry—you got this. —Ella Chochrek

Invest in a flywheel. We all know that one guy who has one, just zipping across campus like he has no care in the world. That nonchalant appearance is all a facade though. Flywheel guy has exactly one care in the world: avoiding his hook-ups. There is actually no better way to avoid a former flame than blowing past them at approximately 35 mph. You can't stop and talk because momentum and whatnot. It's foolproof. (Note: every assumption made about flywheel guy is conjecture. There's a strong chance he actually doesn't have a care in the world.) —Wesley Jenkins

Stay in your room. You can't run into anyone from your past if you shut yourself in and refuse to move on with your life (Samantha, please take me back). —Aaron Brezel

NOAH JODICE | STUDENT LIFE

The secret guide to Netflix and chill

WESLEY JENKINS
SENIOR FORUM EDITOR

Our parents claim that technology has made us lazy and that we expect everything to just be handed to us in the comfort of our homes without any face-to-face interactions. Well, I'm here to tell you they are absolutely, 100 percent, without any shadow of a doubt, correct.

In 2015, we saw the unveiling of self-driving cars, Postmates food delivery and the popularity of the new hook-up strategy, the Netflix and chill. While the first two have their own, uh…problems; the third has been proven so effective that Pi Beta Phi even made a sweatshirt about it.

That being said, there are far too many misconceptions as to how Netflix and chill is supposed to work. Lonely students up too late and at the end of their Kleenex supply simply assume that a text and a short walk later, they'll be getting lucky. Not so. There are so many subtler nuances to the process that some portion of the population can avoid (ahem, looking at you attractive people), but leave the rest of us frustrated. This Valentine's Day, when you once again find yourself neglected and online, follow these ten steps to get laid (or at the very least, watch a dope movie).

1. ESTABLISH RAPPORT

There's a mistaken belief around the institution of Netflix and chill that it is only used on prospective partners you don't know well. False. The only true way that Netflix and chill has any chance at success is if you get to know them a little bit. Don't just text that guy or girl you met for five minutes on the Circulator and then had to ask a-friend-of-a-friend-of-a-friend to get you their number. No one wants to Netflix and chill with that creeper.

2. DON'T ESTABLISH TOO MUCH RAPPORT

Here is where the delicate balance of a successful Netflix and chill kicks in. You want to have a credible relationship with the person you're chilling with, but you can't have too much of a relationship so that they would see a Netflix and chill invitation to be an affront to common human decency. Just talk about your favorite movies or TV shows. It's fun, flirty and, best of all, casual.

3. INVEST IN NETFLIX

An integral, yet often overlooked step. Most people assume that Netflix and chill just means nominally watching some form of media and then moving on to rest of the night. No, that's wrong. You can't Netflix and chill with Amazon Prime or Hulu Plus or basic cable. That's like going to Harry's for dinner or your Washington University Student Associates for cake. It's just a poor decision.

4. CLEAN UP YOUR ROOM FOR ONCE, PLEASE

No one wants to come over to a disgusting room. Move your dirty clothes from the chair, make your bed, straighten something; it all makes a difference. Also, if you have some time, make a Target run and buy nice decorative lights. They vibe with any room, and even better, they don't give off enough light to illuminate the pigsty you live in.

5. TURN ON YOUR TV

Most aspiring Netflix and chillers forget that the major key is not asking if someone wants to Netflix and chill and then fumbling around for something to watch, but actually starting the night without them. Get something going, it really doesn't matter what it is. As Wash. U. sophomore Lauren—expert Netflix and chiller—said, "I'm usually just watching HGTV, but when I text them I say something really cool and enticing. Pro tip: buy the NFL RedZone package."

6. CRAFT YOUR TEXT

Where "Heyyy" might have worked in the olden days, people have now figured out the tricks. There are guides out there explaining what each successive "y" on the word means. Don't fall into that pitfall. Instead, you want to sound intriguing and mysterious, but still casual and disinterested. Your prospective partner must want to come of their own volition; there is no pressure in a mutual consenting Netflix and chill. Start with a "Hey, I'm watching the new Game of Thrones, have you seen it?" Or maybe, "Hey, just watched the Red Wedding episode and could use a shoulder to cry on?" Or even, "Have you ever heard of Game of Thrones?" It's a choose your own adventure, but keep in mind the first impression you're giving off.

7. SEND THE TEXT

Don't laugh, many a brave candidate has lost the nerve to send their missive at the midnight hour. If this step can serve to remind anyone having those second thoughts about their Valentine's Day last resort, then it should remain here. We, the old guard of the Netflix and chill, support you in all your endeavors.

8. YOU HEAR A KNOCK ON THE DOOR AND YOUR PALMS START SWEATING. THEY'RE HERE. YOU THINK TO YOURSELF, "OH WOW— THIS IS ACTUALLY WORKING. I NEVER THOUGHT I WOULD BE THE TYPE OF PERSON WHO ACTUALLY DOES A NETFLIX AND CHILL. THIS IS TRULY A MOMENTOUS DAY FOR ME. WHAT DO I DO WITH MY HANDS?" AT THIS POINT, YOU HEAR ANOTHER KNOCK ON THE DOOR. YOU REALIZE YOU'VE FORGOTTEN TO OPEN THE DOOR AND HAD BEEN LOST IN YOUR OWN THOUGHTS FOR AN UNREASONABLE AMOUNT OF TIME. YOU BEGIN TO PANIC. WHAT IF THEY WALK AWAY? WHAT IF THEY ASK WHY IT TOOK YOU SO LONG TO OPEN THE DOOR? WHAT IF IT'S NOT THEM AT ALL AND IT'S YOUR SUITEMATE'S SIGNIFICANT OTHER LOOKING TO GET IT ON ON VALENTINE'S DAY BECAUSE TRUTHFULLY THAT'S ONLY NATURAL? WHAT IF… ANOTHER KNOCK.

Open the door.

9. CHILL

It's up to you now young Padawan. Watch out for the awkward pauses when Netflix wants to know if you're still watching. Leave the sound on as a courtesy to your suitemates. And make your move early before both of you get sucked into whatever you're actually watching. Otherwise, there's nothing else I can tell you.

carnal cadenza

Cadenza's dream celebrity threesomes

Here at Cadenza, we spend a lot of time thinking about celebrities and, consequently, which ones we'd like to have sex with. These stars have been getting us particularly hot and bothered:

Oscar Isaac and Shailene Woodley

So there's good news and bad news when you're potentially engaging in three-way sex with Oscar Isaac and Shailene Woodley. The good news is that they're better at acting than just about anyone else right now because they get super in-tune with character psychology, down to the smallest glance and whatnot. So I'm sure engaging in sexual relations with them simultaneously would be a super intense and emotionally rich experience.

The bad news is that the experience would be so intense and emotionally rich that it would make every subsequent sexual endeavor feel empty and insignificant. And I think that's how married couples come to resent each other and go through messy divorces after their kids grow up.

John Krasinski and Emily Blunt

First of all, if you've seen the photos of John Krasinski in Men's Health Magazine post-"13 Hours: The Secret Soldiers of Benghazi" beef-up, this choice needs no explanation. Hot Damn. Plus, what "Office" fangirl hasn't dreamed of being the Pam to Krasinski's adorable, hilarious Jim? Of course, Krasinski already has his Pam: his incredibly talented and gorgeous wife, Emily Blunt. So let's get her in on the action too. That British accent will make for some great pillow talk.

Guy Fieri and the lead singer of Smash Mouth

In a perfect world, you could just get boned by two Guy Fieri's with whatever brand of barbecue sauce he uses as lube, but I feel like that would be cheating for the purposes of this list. The good news is that the lead singer of Smash Mouth looks just like Guy Fieri, and I'm sure he also uses barbecue sauce as lube, so they'd probably get along alright. Tell me with a straight face you don't get off at the thought of their goatees tickling your nether regions as they go down on you. You can't, because if you did you'd be a liar.

Bill Nye the Science Guy and Neil deGrasse Tyson

Do you remember the '90s? I know I do. Everyone was wearing light-wash jeans and we all had a crush on Bill Nye the Science Guy. During science class, when the teacher put on Nye's VHS tape about volcanos, we rapt watchers dreamed of going on a date with Nye. Well, now that we're all older and it's not so creepy, this could be a reality. But now there's a new science guy in town who's equally handsome and eloquent: Neil deGrasse Tyson.

Oh, what a night with these two ponderers of the world could hold. First, we three would pore over the recent issue of Scientific American, a sensual foreplay unrivaled by any other periodical. Afterward, we would retire to a room whose ceiling was but a skylight, so that our activities could be inspired by the worlds above. Nye would create worlds (metaphorically, of course) with his touch, while Tyson's precision would leave no man wondering whether the Earth was flat or round, for the Earth would be whole in ourselves.

John Boyega and Daisy Ridley

Every year there are new interview darlings—you know, the celebrities in interviews who seem to steal the show with their down-to-earth, bright-eyed candor about their place in the industry and their rise to stardom. We all want to be their best friends and spend hours sending one another the newest interview. "Did you see what they said about their favorite food?", or "They love the Earth, too!", we gush to our friends.

Well, this year those two are the stars of one of the largest franchises in cinema history: "Star Wars." John Boyega and Daisy Ridley swept us off our feet as they impersonated one another and made each other laugh on late-night couches and at press junkets alike. Their youth, paired with their obvious love for one another, places them at the top of the list for my dream threesomes. With Boyega's impressions of the rest of the cast and Ridley's striking resemblance to Keira Knightley, it may even seem like you have the entire franchise with you, too.

— TV Review —

'Not Safe with Nikki Glaser'

when Tuesday, 9:30pm
channel Comedy Central

★★★☆☆

KATHARINE JARUZELSKI
MANAGING EDITOR

I'll admit it: when I first learned that Comedy Central was debuting "Not Safe with Nikki Glaser," a new variety talk show about all things sexual, I did not have high hopes. A show exclusively about sex seemed like a cheap ploy for ratings and attention; you don't exactly need to promise high-quality humor to get people to watch a pretty comedian tell sex jokes.

And I don't mean to disparage the very talented Nikki Glaser—quite the opposite. When I first heard about "Not Safe," I thought she was better than this. Glaser has proven her comedic chops through her successful stand-up career and her hosting duties on MTV's short-lived "Nikki & Sara Live"; I would have much rather seen her behind the "Daily Show" desk than reporting from a foot fetish party. So when I hesitantly tuned in to Comedy Central on Tuesday night, I was preparing myself for disappointment. Luckily, "Not Safe" exceeded my expectations.

Not unlike its subject matter, the premiere starts out slow but eventually builds to a comedic climax. We're first introduced to Glase r through a somewhat tedious monologue about her sexual awakening at age 13, which was sparked by a certain risque roller-coaster scene in the movie "Fear." We then meet the episode's two comedian guests, Rachel Feinstein and Rory Scovel. These comedians are pretty much just there to provide additional comic relief, but I'd take that over a panel of B-list celebrities or self-proclaimed "sexperts" any day. Glaser and her guests banter in front of their studio audience for a while—sounding a bit like middle school boys at times—before the show really gets into the good stuff.

In her first pre-taped segment, Glaser takes a unique approach to the topic of "friend-zoning." Wondering whether she has been accidentally friend-zoning any of her closest pals, Glaser invites several of her friends—male and female—to answer questions like "Would you have sex with me?" while hooked up to a lie detector. (Spoiler alert: the answer is an overwhelming "yes.") Her friends' bashful responses are entertaining, but the unexpected star of the bit is John, the mustachioed man administering the polygraph test, who chimes in with such hilarious tidbits as "Fingering's for guys with small wieners." The segment doesn't make the leap to criticizing the oftentimes-sexist notion of friend-zoning, but it does encourage people to just be honest about their feelings, damn it.

From there, "Not Safe" moves into by far the best segment of its pilot episode, a game called Tinder Tapout. Glaser introduces us to Kayla, a made-up Tinder user and "the most horrible woman imaginable." The game involves reading Kayla's Tinder conversation with a real match named R.L. (a self-described "bad boy with [his] s--- together") and having the show's comedian guests guess at which point R.L. stops responding. The gameplay aspect isn't all that exciting, but the conversation between Kayla and R.L. left me laughing out loud. It's clear that Glaser has some really solid writers on her staff—gems from Kayla include "three [kids]. One with Jesus. Global warming took her. Hot car." The show wholeheartedly commits to the bit, allowing the interaction to escalate in hilarious, unexpected ways. Perhaps the best thing to come out of the segment, though, is @PartyB---Kayla, my new favorite Twitter handle. Follow Kayla for important updates like "I only drink lime juice and keystone premium because it tastes like the ball pit I lost my virginity in."

"Not Safe" shines when it allows its sex-themed premises to merely serve as set-ups for original, well-crafted jokes. If you're looking for subversive or groundbreaking comedy, you won't find it here—try "Inside Amy Schumer"—but you will find an approach to sex that is lighthearted, funny and unexpectedly clever. Much of this is thanks to the show's enthusiastic host. Contrary to my initial reservations, Glaser, a self-described "curious perv," seems very much in her element on "Not Safe." Her easygoing and candid attitude set a pleasant tone for the show; she aims to be a sex-positive best friend rather than just a smirking source of dick jokes.

A show like "Not Safe" could easily devolve into something akin to a dirtier version of "Tosh.0," but so far, Glaser and her writers have stayed mostly out of the gutter with their clever and curious approach to sexual humor. The pilot has its high and low points, but hopefully, as the season continues, the show will figure out what works and abandon what doesn't. And if things don't work out for "Not Safe," maybe we can get a spin-off about @PartyB---Kayla—there's no shortage of material there.

sexy sports

The top 10 silliest sports sex scandals in history

AARON BREZEL
SENIOR SPORTS EDITOR

Maybe it's because our own sex lives are so boring. Or, maybe it's because athletes are just so dang beautiful. For whatever reason, we fans demand all-access passes to our favorite athletes' sexual histories. Look at it this way—if you can score in the NBA, you can't score in the bedroom without most of the country hearing about it. Particularly in the last decade, this privacy invasion has rattled more than a few closet skeletons and has lead to the swift demise of a few sports icons.

We could debate the merits of exposing athletes' intimate lives ad infinitum, but that's simply not as fun as delving into these sordid affairs in honor of impending Valentine's Day. Here are the 10 most hilarious, wacky, what-would-their-mothers-think sexcapades from the sexy world of sports.

10. A-Rod swipes bags and digits

This one isn't a sex scandal per say, but it seems wrong to leave a guy like Alex Rodriguez off this list. After being benched for the first game of the 2012 American League Divisional Series, the oft-maligned slugger spotted a pair of cute ladies sitting above the Yankee dugout. Ever the enterprising individual, Rodriguez instructed a ball boy to toss the girls a ball with a note written on it asking for their numbers. A-Rod got their numbers, but also caught major flack from the Yankee fan base that saw their $275 million-dollar man chasing trim during the playoffs.

Of all the reasons to get kicked off a collegiate sports team (gambling, prostitution, et cetera) poor Brandon Davies got the ax for pre-marital sex. Back in 2011, the sophomore forward was enjoying a strong sophomore campaign, averaging 11.1 points per game, a team-high 6.2 rebounds per game for the devoutly Mormon Brigham Young University Cougars (the animal, not the divorcee). Then tragedy struck. After a university investigation, Davies admitted that he violated the school's honor code that prohibits fun things like pre-marital sex and the consumption of alcoholic beverages, tea, coffee and drugs. Davies gracefully accepted his punishment and was allowed to return to the team for his junior and senior seasons, presumably under the condition that he wear a chastity belt.

8. Eugene Robinson low-balls undercover cop

On the eve of the 1999 Super Bowl, Atlanta Falcons cornerback Eugene Robinson offered a cop $40 to perform oral sex on him and was subsequently arrested. Personally, I understand if athletes want to have sex before a big game to stay loose, but if he needed some tail that badly, he could have just asked his wife, who was sleeping soundly in their hotel room a couple of blocks away. The Miami Police Department allowed Robinson to play out the Super Bowl, but, as you would expect, he looked terrible in the 34-19 loss to the Denver Broncos, allowing an 80-yard touchdown reception.

The irony? The morning before the arrest, Robinson received the Bart Starr Award, given annually to football players who exhibit strong moral character. He had to give the trophy back afterward.

7. Pacman regrets making it rain

Someone needs to tell Adam "Pacman" Jones how strip clubs work. In a series of events that led to his highly publicized suspension from the 2007 NFL season, Jones "made it rain" in a Las Vegas club with rapper Nelly. Jones, however, never had any intention of giving up the money that he had just flung onto the floor. When the dancers went to collect, he got physical and was thrown out of the club in a violent altercation resulting in the paralysis of the club's manager. Jones has since made major strides to clean up his reputation, but I still wonder—does he think that the five-second rule applies to money, too?

6. Delonte West shags Lebron's mom?

Let's be clear before we discuss this one at all. Delonte West has been very clear that he never had any kind of sexual encounter with Lebron James' mom. But just because the rumors were unfounded doesn't mean they didn't still have a real effect. The story first surfaced during the Cavaliers' 2010 playoff series against the Boston Celtics, and it became a major story line by the fourth game. Coincidentally, that break coincided with a serious drop in production for King James. Before the rumor, Lebron averaged 54 percent from the field. After, James shot a meager 34 percent over the final three games, all Cavs losses. That offseason, Lebron signed a contract with the Miami Heat. Coincidence? I think not!

Coaches and players take note: If you want to get inside King James' head, sleep with his mother.

5. Viking floating sex palace

NFL bye weeks are supposed to be a chance for players to recuperate from the punishing week-by-week schedule. Some players golf, others spend time with their families and a select few hold boat orgies.

In 2005, 17 members of the Minnesota Vikings chartered a cruise out on Lake Minnetonka that was supposed to last 3 1/2 hours. The Boat came back to port after 40 minutes after the crew witnessed hardcore sex acts including but not limited to butt-groping, sex toy usage, assorted oral favors and topless lap dancing. By the time the dust settled, four Vikings were charged with the big three: indecent conduct, disorderly conduct, and lewd or lascivious conduct. I assume they all high-fived afterwards.

4. Wife swap

Who doesn't love the show "Wife Swap"? Two families with struggling dynamics switch wives for a couple weeks, learn a little bit about themselves, then reunite with a greater appreciation for one another. Yankees pitchers Fritz Peterson and Mike Kekich liked the idea so much they decided to make it permanent. In 1972, Peterson and Kekich swapped wives, houses, even children.

Peterson got the better end of the bargain as he and Kekich's ex-wife are still together after 40-plus years. Kekich, on the other hand, separated from Peterson's wife after less than a year. Love is one of life's great mysteries.

3. Manti Te'o gets catfished

The nuts and bolts of this story are still disputed, but here is what's relatively clear: Manti Teo's girlfriend, Lennay Kekua, never existed. A man named Ronaiah Tuiasosopo created the fake identity after becoming infatuated with the University of Notre Dame middle linebacker. The two communicated online over the course of several years and developed enough of a relationship for Te'o to openly state her existence in media interviews. The story first broke when Te'o announced that Kekua and his grandmother both died on Sept. 11, 2012. A subsequent investigation by Deadspin revealed that Kekua never existed and pointed to Tuiasosopo as the mastermind. When the story became public, Te'o openly admitted to never meeting Kekua in person, citing that his online relationship would appear "crazy." A second investigation by the University of Notre Dame supported that Te'o had no nefarious intentions and was simply the victim of an elaborate hoax. Poor guy.

2. Ronaldo Ruiz Nazario gets an unexpected surprise

In 2008, after an argument with his girlfriend, Ronaldo Ruiz Nazario did what any Brazilian soccer superstar would do: He rented three hookers. After booking them in a Rio de Janeiro club and taking them up to his hotel room, Nazario was rightfully shocked when he realized all three of them had penises.

"I cried a lot afterwards," he later stated.

When Nazario refused to pay the one enterprising hooker 15,000 pounds to keep quiet, the police were called and the story leaked to the press. While prostitution is legal in Rio, fans take the masculinity of their prized athletes very seriously. One of the prostitutes stated that Nazario "treated me with caresses and called me princess." Regardless of claims, Nazario never received any major backlash from the incident.

1. Max Mosley has a really weird kink

Max Mosley is famous for two reasons. One, he was the head of the FIA (Formula One Racing) from 1993-2009. Two, his dad Oswald Mosley was a notorious Nazi supporter. As it turns out, the apple may not fall too far from the tree. Back in 2008, the British tabloid News of the World released a five-hour-long video of what has been described as a "Nazi-themed orgy." Dressed as a concentration camp detainee, the 67-year-old Mosley had his head and genitals checked for lice by five prostitutes dressed in German World War II uniforms before being beaten. Mosley got to keep his job at FIA and was able to sue the news organization for nearly $2 million in defamation and legal costs. I don't even know what to say to conclude that story, so I'll just let it simmer in your brain for the rest of your life.

Celebrity sports crushes

When you dedicate yourself to the craft of a sport, you tend to immerse yourself in the entire world of athletics. That can lead to some intense fandoms and athletic crushes. Student Life asked some of Wash. U.'s most prominent athletes about the professional athletes that make their hearts beat faster. — Danny Schwartz, Staff Writer

Roger Federer, Tennis

Who's crushing?
Katybeth Biewen, senior basketball player
Why?
"First and foremost, he's a boss on the tennis court. He's also extremely classy, he has an adorable family and his Nike outfits are always on point. I could say more, but I'll leave it at that."

Natalie Coughlin, Swimming

Who's crushing?
Reed Dalton, senior swimmer
Why?
"Not only is she still totally ripped and kicking butt after competing in the past three Olympics, but she's a bro and trains exclusively with the University of California at Berkeley's men's team while also being an impressive chef and gardener outside the water. Would love to race her sometime, although I don't know if I would win."

Rory McIlroy, Golf

Who's crushing?
Connie Zhou, senior golfer
Why?
"Because he's Irish, has a great physique, has an amazing swing and handles success and failure well. He just seems like a super cool guy."

Alex Morgan, Soccer

Who's crushing?
Lizzie Crist, junior soccer player
Why?
"Her hair is flawless the entire game. And have you seen anyone bend it like her? I like keeping a shutout, but if she and I went up against each other… I'd probably let her score."

Ronda Rousey, MMA

Who's crushing?
Andrew Sanders, sophomore basketball player
Why?
"I respect her athletic abilities. I've seen a bunch of her fights, and I think it's pretty impressive how tough she is and how she has only lost one fight in her career."

Best places to 'get dome' in the Dome

Now that the Edward Jones Dome is down, it's up to us to come up with alternative uses for this lonely building. If you manage to sneak past security with your main squeeze, here are the best places get down and dirty on the artificial turf. — Sports Staff

Inside a monster truck left behind after Monster Jam

Sports Illustrated readers may have voted the Jones Dome as the worst place to watch football back in 2008, but 10-10 experts would call it the only place to watch the Monster Jam truck bonanza in the Greater St. Louis metropolitan area. I went to such a jam at the dawn of the millennium, and the experience continues to influence my sexuality in ways that would make Freud bust a wiener schnitzel. The dirt, the destruction, the sound of 66-inch diameter tires supporting 9,000 pounds of cantilevers, nitrogen shock absorbers and full tubular chassis…my chest tightens at the thought. I don't have any proof that the Jones Dome houses any monster trucks during the off-season, but what I do have is faith—I just read "The Secret" by Rhonda Byrne, so I know, without a shred of doubt, that somewhere deep within the belly of the stadium lies a monster truck ripe for driving you and your partner to pound town. The interiors of monster trucks are rife with steel trusses and live wires, which only serve to boost the romantic ambiance already established by the giant image of a demon skull airbrushed on the exterior frame. Monster trucks are capable of making 360-degree backflips, so you and your partner are undoubtedly going to engage in some sexual theatrics so daring you'll forget that the NFL expected St. Louis County taxpayers to support a billion-dollar stadium replacement for a team so permanently soaked in the marinade of 8-8 mediocrity. Bonus points if you recreate the "Titanic" steamy car window scene on the shock-proof Plexiglas windshield. —Becca Christman

The Doggie (Style) Diner

Originally known for its array of overpriced snacks and drinks, the Doggie Diner now has a new claim to fame as the premier location for doggy style on this side of the Mississippi River. If you really want to show your partner "The Greatest Show on Turf," take them to the Doggie Diner, complete with smelly, fly-infested Rams jerseys and cheerleader uniforms for your role-playing needs. While the stench of moldy, frozen hot dogs may be off-putting, look on the bright side: Each of you now has a new, rock-hard sex toy to enjoy. Most importantly, you'll have a chance to pay homage to former Rams legends, like running back Marshall Faulk, as you scream "Faulk me!" at a higher decibel than anything ever heard during a Rams game. —Nick Kauzlarich

That random stretch of cement where the end zone used to be

Not since the halcyon "Greatest Show on Turf" days of Kurt Warner and company have the Rams reached the end zone with any frequency in the Jones Dome. Now's your chance to do what the blue and gold have been unable to do for more than a decade: score in the Dome. Specifically in that forgotten segment of the arena's cement floor where the carpeted end zone used to unfurl. Pick your spot, get started and rejoice, for there are no officials left to flag you for an excessive celebration penalty or a uniform violation. — Zach Kram

On the Jumbotron

Picture it. Standing erect on the 50-yard line, buttocks taut as the extensive video infrastructure captures you and your partner from every angle, broadcasting it on one of the biggest screens in the St. Louis metro area. Feeling even more adventurous? The Dome has the capacity for more than 66,000 onlookers. After all, there isn't much else to do now that the Rams are gone. — Aaron Brezel

The nosebleeds where you sat when your freshman floor went to a Rams game

You were awkward. Your palms were sweaty, knees weak and your arms were heavy. There's pesto on your sweater already, it's from Bear's Den spaghetti. You were a freshman; you were out of your mind terrified and said yes to everything out of sheer panic. You didn't even like football. The nosebleeds your Residential College director subsidized for your dorm's monthly outing were so high up you couldn't even smell that guy from your floor who holed up in his room 14 hours a day playing League of Legends. On that fateful night, you, your two suitemates who you liked, your roommate who you hated and that group that was always talking about some place called "Harry's" trailed behind your resident adviser and hot Washington University Student Associate like tiny ducklings toward an evening of awkward small talk, forced cheering and gratuitous discussions about the last General Chemistry exam. You probably forgot any of this happened until now, but everyone knows that the best sexual fantasies stem from repressed memories. Here's to hoping your high altitude hump-a-thon is shared with that hottie from your floor that hasn't seen you since you grew out your bangs sophomore year. — Becca Christman

NO UNIFORMS, NO PROBLEM

Club sports teams get naked for the Sex Issue

ARIEL VASSER | STUDENT LIFE

SKYLER KESSLER | STUDENT LIFE

STEPHEN HUBER | STUDENT LIFE

Top: WUWU
Second from top: Contraband
Left: Club Crew men's team
Below: Club Crew woman's team

STEPHEN HUBER | STUDENT LIFE

for more photos from our sex issue shoots, visit studlife.com

Over 70 student groups entered for a chance to strip down with Student Life. Here are some of the winners.

k.a.r.l.

STEPHEN HUBER | STUDENT LIFE

colour magazine

HOLLY RAVAZZOLO | STUDENT LIFE

african student association

STEPHEN HUBER | STUDENT LIFE

staam

MEGAN MAGRAY | STUDENT LIFE

all student theatre

SKYLER KESSLER | STUDENT LIFE

cast n' crew

STEPHEN HUBER | STUDENT LIFE

wusauce

MEGAN MAGRAY | STUDENT LIFE

suspicious of whistlers

MICHAELA LANGE | STUDENT LIFE

